On Offense: The best and most unique forward in the RMAC this season. He's a terrific shooter that's both comfortable from 3 and all over the midrange. Additionally, Malcolm has a terrific right-handed hook when operating on the block combined with fluid footwork that allows him to counter in a variety of ways. He doesn't look to finish with his left enough in the post, but remarkable interior awareness and touch allow him to thoroughly punish smaller defenders that coaches frequently try defending him with. He's equally comfortable operating on the perimeter or the interior and his ability to shoot over guards can make him a very difficult match-up. His first-step isn't very good and he does get out jumped by much smaller players on occasion. On top of this his handle is only average for his size and he hasn't shown the ability to consistently create for his teammates while functioning on the perimeter despite his heady post passing.

On Defense: An average defender who relies on his IQ and is versatile enough to switch onto guards or posts without getting targeted. He's not incredibly quick laterally and will get beat 1 on 1 by dynamic guards and explosive wings. He's a solid rebounder who loves sneaking in for tip-ins when bigs forget to box-out. Athletic tools will probably hold him back from ever being much more than average on the perimeter. Needs more experience defending athletic perimeter players as he mostly guarded interior forwards in college.

Professional Role: Hybrid

Optimal Play Style

Really unique hybrid forward who projects as someone that can space the floor and score the ball using whatever the defense gives him. A good IQ and willingness to defend should allow him to work well as a guy that doesn't need a high usage rate to positively impact the game. Lots of experience already playing against European competition should give him easier an easier acclimation period.

Fraser Malcolm is one of the odd players in DII basketball that was as equally effective playing in tempo as he was playing in bigger slower lineups. His ability to function as a pseudo post creator or perimeter-oriented shooter gives him a ton of functionality in so many lineup variations.

Off the Court

Really sharp person who will be going back to Europe either way after his college career. His potential as a national athlete is high and the development he's made as a shooter and playmaker over his career are very promising. He's coming off a torn meniscus but shouldn't miss much time. There's also a lot of great footage of him competing at the Commonwealth games where he was able to show more guard skills.

Summary

A remarkably consistent sharp-shooting international forward with the ability to score from all levels of the court.
